The political character of cricket and nation is conflicted. At different times the game has demonstrated the capacity for both liberation and repression; bound up, for example, in both the cause of West Indian self-government and the enforced racial segregation of the South African apartheid regime (James [1963] 1986; Booth 1998).

Arguably, England's "national games" are football and, particularly, cricket. As cricket historian Dominic Malcolm argues, the link between cricket and England's national identity became solidified through literature. Works such as James Love's "Cricket: an heroic poem" and Mary Mitford's "our Village," along
